

Brice Dellsperger

AIR DE PARIS

32, rue Louise Weiss

February 20–March 20

In this installment of Brice Dellsperger's series "Body Double," 1995–, which spans twenty-four video projects, the Paris-based artist continues to remake sequences from feature films, especially psychosexual thrillers like the 1984 Brian De Palma movie for which the series is named. In Body Double 22, 2007, Dellsperger's longtime collaborator Jean-Luc Verna, an artist whose pierced and tattooed body is unmistakable and specific, plays every character, including the central married couple, in sequences taken from Stanley Kubrick's Eyes Wide Shut (1999). Dellsperger digitally stitches the actor into the scene in multiples: Dozens of menacing Vernas, hooded in red, witness the high priest Verna order the commencement of a sexual ritual performed by docile, available Vernas; in the background, a Verna hammers on an electric keyboard. The dialogue of a tightly wound thriller unspools and is rewoven as inchoate melodrama. Dime-store wigs, pared-down sets, imprecise lip-syncing (doublage in French), and the epileptic seams of digital editing do more than simply parody the luxe art direction of a Hollywood feature. These techniques treat films as bodies, re-dressing them in a way that reminds viewers of the common root of travesty and transvestite but also cutting into them, rearranging, castrating, or enhancing, with the editing scars left in view. With Body Double 23, 2007, a remake of De Palma's remake of murdered starlet Elizabeth Short's audition reel in The Black Dahlia (2006), Dellsperger's sixteen-year use of the director's oeuvre as medium ensures that he operates not just on the level of a single film but on that of individual, career, genre, and historiography.

Brice Dellsperger, Body Double 22, 2007, still from a color film, 35 minutes.

— Julia Langbein